Doctor's account confirms rumors

By Dick Patrick
USA TODAY

TORONTO — For years, rumors have circulated that Soviet Bloc countries conduct research to discover other performance-enhancing drugs and steroids that mask the presence of banned drugs.

That notion was confirmed Tuesday by Dr. Robert Kerr, a San Gabriel, Calif., physician and former steroids advocate, during testimony at the Canadian drug inquiry.

"I was given the names of research institutions in and around Moscow," Kerr said. "Informants told me that athletes were giving their specimens of urine to evaluative blocking agents."

Kerr said his information came from Spanish doctor Guillermo Latch, a consultant to Eastern Bloc countries, plus coaches and athletes in 1984.

"I find it hard to evaluate (Kerr's claims)," said the head of the U.S. Olympic testing lab at UCLA, Dr. Don Catlin, who has a representative currently in the USSR. "You'd like to have independent corroboration from impeccable sources. How and where you do that I don't know."

Kerr also said that the USOC's 1984 informal testing program was used by athletes to gain knowledge about how long it took to get banned drugs out of their systems in order to pass competition testing.

The USOC claims the non-punitive program was designed to give drug testers experience prior to the Los Angeles Olympics. The program was dropped in the spring of 1984 after a couple of months.

"I think that was a mistake in retrospect," Catlin said, "but it was an honest mistake at the time. Many groups were not abusing the system."

A letter Kerr wrote in 1985 to U.S. drug officials, introduced as evidence at the inquiry, claimed:

▶ That athletes were using ram testosterone, which could not be detected and caused no allergic response. Catlin said testosterone from any source can be detected.

▶ That strength athletes were using low doses of strychnine and nerve gas in combination with caffeine and barbitutates to stimulate the central nervous system. Kerr added that neurotransmitters — drugs affecting the central nervous system — have also been popular since 1984.

▶ Soviet swimmers were injected with about 1½ quarts of air or gas in the rectum and colon to achieve better flotation.

▶ That Mexican racewalkers who won medals in Los Angeles in 1984 used Pyruvate-Dehydrogenase, an injectable substance that aids endurance.

▶ That a possible reason the Soviet Bloc countries boycotted the 1984 Games under the mistaken assumption that a new drug testing system would be used that might render their masking efforts ineffective.

▶ Kerr prescribed steroids to U.S. medalists in '84, 1C
